OSHA Changes for 2018

Each new year brings a variety of updates in the safety and health world. Below are a few of the top OSHA changes to watch for this year:

- Final Rule on Occupational Exposure to Beryllium (and proposed rule to modify standards)
  - Beryllium is a strong metal commonly used for its electrical and thermal conductivity. Workers who inhale it can develop serious lung diseases and cancer. OSHA felt that the previous exposure limits for beryllium were outdated, so on January 9, 2017, a new final rule was established. Employers in general industry, shipyards or construction need to comply with the new beryllium exposure limits by March 12, 2018.

- Final Rule on the Crane Operator Certification Extension
  - OSHA initially issued a final rule on cranes and derricks in August 2010. This rule included standards for crane operator certification. Stakeholders believed that a certified crane operator needed additional training and evaluation, therefore, OSHA delayed the deadline for crane operator certification to November 10, 2017. In November of last year, the compliance deadline was delayed again until November 10, 2018.

- Compliance with Certain Walking-Working Surfaces and Personal Fall Protection Systems Standards
  - Slips, trips and falls are the leading cause of workplace injuries and fatalities in general industry. To reduce these injuries, OSHA revised its standards on walking-working surfaces, which includes floors, ladders, stairways, ramps and scaffolds. Most aspects of this rule became effective on January 17, 2017, but the requirement on fixed ladders comes into play on November 19, 2018.
